2021 was a pivotal year for Jewish-Arab relations in Israel. In May, Israel experienced some of the worst clashes between Arab and Jewish citizens in its history. Only weeks later, an Arab party joined Israel’s governing coalition for the first time. In November, this government passed an unprecedented NIS 30 billion (USD 9.6 billion) socio-economic development budget for Arab communities in Israel.

The May events are widely compared to the deadly events of October 2000 for their impact on Jewish-Arab relations in Israel. In the wake of those events, the Government of Israel formally acknowledged longstanding inequalities, the term 'shared society' took root in the civil sector, and Arab community leaders deepened their pursuit of equal rights and inclusion.

Since 2006, the IATF has been an educational resource for American Jewish communities about these developments, enabling leadership, funders and professionals to become increasingly informed stakeholders in some of Israel's most consequential domestic issues.

The violence last May raised hard questions about the state of Jewish-Arab relations and the investments that had been made over the last two decades. Still, just as Israel's government and civil society did not retreat, neither did American Jewish leadership.

This year, many American Jewish organizations involved in these issues dug in deeper, and many of those long contemplating engagement leaned in. The demand this urgency fueled for IATF resources and expertise was also characterized by thoughtful awareness of the complexity and sensitivity of these issues.

This combination accelerated changes to IATF educational activities that had begun to take shape years earlier. The goals and programs detailed in the pages below reflect more supports for partner-led strategic learning, professional development and training, and tailored resources for Israel education platforms, along with ongoing activities.

The IATF Executive Committee remains steadfast in its commitment to ensuring these issues are accessible to the full spectrum of the American Jewish community. We invite you to learn more.

Sincerely,

Brian Lurie

The Inter-Agency Task Force on Israeli Arab Issues (IATF) is a non-partisan educational resource center that supports American Jewish leadership, professionals, and funders in learning about Arab society and Jewish-Arab relations in Israel and effectively incorporating these issues into their work.

Since 2006, IATF has provided educational programs and resources tailored to American Jewish communities and organizations. Today, IATF is a trusted educational bridge, making field insights and expertise accessible in a growing range of American Jewish contexts.

Expanding Services

As these issues gain prominence in Israel and the US, more American Jewish organizations seek to strengthen their capacities and bring Arab citizens of Israel into their community engagement and activities.

In response, along with our core programs and publications, IATF is providing more professional development and training, content and curricula creation, and support for strategic processes and discussions.

As we expand our services and reach, we continue to rely on our member coalition to ensure these issues are a mainstream part of American Jewish discourse.

Jewish-Arab relations in Israel are impacted by the social and economic realities in Arab communities and fluctuations in the larger Israeli-Palestinian conflict. This year, a series of watershed events underscored the connection between the economic and social, challenging and expanding activities in the field.

May Events. On top of economic strains worsened by COVID-19, four elections, and unrelenting violent crime in Arab communities, this past May flashpoints in East Jerusalem triggered an outpouring of frustration and riots in Arab society. These escalated into widespread clashes between Arabs and Jews in mixed cities and beyond, sending shockwaves throughout the country.

Government budgets. By November, this new government approved a long-awaited NIS 30 billion socio-economic development plan for Arab society, building on its predecessor, GR-922. This new plan is broader, designed in greater partnership with Arab local and civil society leadership, and touches on issues of shared society.

Unprecedented visibility. As a result, public acknowledgment of concerns in Arab society have never been higher in Israel. How this moment will affect overall efforts to narrow gaps and strengthen Jewish-Arab relations depends on the various government, community, civil society, Jewish and Arab stakeholders involved.

Key Insights. IATF maintains a vast network of experts and leaders from government, civil society, academia, and communities in order to synthesize and provide key insights into this dynamic field.
Over the last decade, unprecedented Government of Israel budgets for socio-economic development of Arab society expanded strategic opportunities for American Jewish philanthropy. In 2021, the first major five year plan (GR-922) was on a one-year extension. Meanwhile, the fragile coalition inaugurated in June would not approve new budgets until November. At the same time, the global pandemic and clashes which shook the country in May accentuated urgent funding needs.

In this complex and dynamic year, IATF brought leading government and civil society figures to brief on new priority areas and government plans. We produced in-depth reports on key developments, and convened discussions to support greater coordination and alignment between funders and the field.

SVF/IATF Mixed Cities Series.
One of several collaborations with SVF, Prof. Daniel Monterescu kicked off this series on cities with sizable Jewish and Arab populations.
The pivotal events in 2021 sparked many American Jewish organizations to lean in and learn more. IATF expanded our services to formally provide training programs for professionals and educators, and to support strategic organizational processes.

Development & Training. Building on our training work for JAFI emissaries and Birthright educators, IATF partnered with JCPA to pilot a 4-part professional development series for JCRCs. Participants explored topics and best practices for engaging these issues in their communities.

Israel Education. Deepening our Israel educator track, we worked with Birthright to begin updating sites in Arab society post-pandemic and to adapt Israel educator trainings for American tour staffers. We produced sessions for iCenter's Master's program in Israel, and Certificate Program in Experiential Israel Education.

Strategic Discussions. After the May violence, IATF was invited as a non-partisan issue expert to support JFNA, the Jewish Agency, and several federations with processes to set priorities and integrate these issues into their work and structure.

Briefings. Part of our ongoing services, IATF presented to American Jewish lay and professional groups nationwide about the dynamic landscape of Jewish-Arab relations with respect to their Israel engagement efforts.
In partnership with dozens of Jewish organizations, IATF brought Arab and Jewish experts from Israel to share their work and perspectives with diverse audiences. Six nation-wide calls on major events – four in partnership with the JCPA – brought behind-the-headlines insights to thousands. With local and regional partners, we helped make these issues part of American Jewish communal events and discussions.

FINANCIAL RESOURCES

Since 2006, IATF has been supported by steadfast commitment of annual dues from a broad coalition of American Jewish organizational members.

Members are fundamental to IATF's mission of making Arab society and Jewish-Arab relations in Israel an integral and enriching part of American Jewish discourse.

With interest in these issues growing, demand for IATF programs and services now exceeds the professional capacities that can be sustained by dues alone.

In 2022, IATF will initiate a fee-for-service track for in-depth professional services as a secondary income stream, enabling us to diversity our financial resources while deepening our impact.

We remain committed to our non-partisan mission and to ensuring any new funding sources align with IATF’s dedication to the wide range of organizations in the American Jewish community.
